ONE of the most extraordinary cases of ignorance of rauitary matters that has ever come to our knowledge, says the Sanitary Engineer, occurred about a year ago in a New Jersey town. A gentleman of means and considerable intelligence, living in a pretty villa in that place, was troubled by the back-flow from a cesspool into the kitchensiak. To remedy the difficulty, he had the cesspool pumped out and its contents spread over his lawn, with the idea that it would prove a good fertilizer. As an indirect result of this folly, three of his own children died of diphtheria and two of his neighbor's, yet he is far from being convinced that his course was unwise and has since repeated it, and would have continued doing so but for the interference of his neighbors.
